Nobody went to the South Pole until 1911. Ronald Amundsen, from Norway, and an Englishman, Robert Scott, both wanted to be the first person to go there. They both left their countries by ship in June of 1910 and arrived in Antarctica in January of 1911.

About nine months later, both teams started their trips down to the South Pole. And their ways of traveling decided which team would win. Amundsen's team used dogs, and Scott's team used horses. On 14 December 1911, Amundsen raised the flag of Norway at the South Pole. Because horses weren't good at walking on snow, it took Scott's team 77 days to arrive at the South Pole. They got there on January 17, 1912 and found that Amundsen was ahead of them. Scott was very sad about this, but it wasn't the end of the story.

After days of cold weather and little food, Scott lost his men one after another, and he was the final one to meet the end of his life. No one on his team lived to go back home and tell people what happened. People only learned it through Scott's diary.
